The Daily Quote

"House Republicans rolled out an aggressive response to President Barack Obama’s immigration policies on Friday, rallying conservatives hungry for a confrontation between the GOP-led Congress and the White House. But a big hurdle stands in their way: the United States Senate. Moderate Senate Democrats and a handful of GOP senators are balking at a House plan that would block Obama’s new policy of deferring deportations for millions of undocumented immigrants, along with the administration’s earlier protections for immigrants brought to the country illegally at a young age... The opposition from these key senators makes it almost certain that the plan would fail to gain the 60 votes needed to break a Democratic filibuster, reigniting long-festering tension between the House and the Senate that GOP leaders have been eager to avoid. ‘I think the defunding action leads us to a potential government shutdown scenario, which is a self-inflicted political wound for Republicans,’ Sen. Mark Kirk, a moderate Illinois Republican facing reelection in 2016, said in an interview."
